Alumni Profile: Wendy Cohn '88 and Mark Termini '84

When Mark Termini '84 and Wendy Cohn '88 started their sports agency, Mark Termini Associates Inc in 1986, they could not envision the success that would lie ahead. Termini had recently graduated from CSU's Cleveland-Marshall College of Law and got into the business by signing his first clients through Northeast Ohio connections from his basketball playing days. Cohn was still enrolled in the law school's evening program and working full-time as a victim advocate when she started with the sports agency soon after Mark entered the business.

"From the very beginning, the business has been extremely competitive and all-consuming," Termini recalled. "In the early stages of MTA, it was a fight for survival. Fortunately, we were able to evolve and grow from there."

What started as a small agency between business and life partners representing a handful of clients grew as Cohn and Termini built MTA into one of the most respected NBA player representation firms in the industry. The agency managed by the now-married pair has gone on to represent approximately 75 NBA players including more than 30 first-round NBA Draft selections. Termini has negotiated more than $2 billion worth of NBA contracts.

Policing and 'Bluelining'

Monday, April 26 | 5:00 p.m. | Virtual

Professor Aya Gruber, University of Colorado Law School

Prof. Gruber will explore the increasingly popular claim that racialized brutality is not a malfunction of policing, but its function. This claim contradicts the conventional narrative, which remains largely accepted, that the police exist to vindicate the community's interest in solving, reducing, and preventing crime. A perusal of the history of organized policing in the United States, however, reveals that it was never mainly about interdicting crime. From its inception in the late 1800s, organized policing served the social, political, and economic priorities of empowered groups, from supporting Southern agrarian capitalist interests by imposing de facto slavery on emancipated Blacks to bolstering Northern industrialization by oppressing immigrant laborers. Thereafter, police forces grew in response, not to spikes in garden-variety crimes, but to political campaigns and cultural anxieties.
